SECTION A: SUMMARY WRITING [30 MARKS]

Question I: Summary (15 marks)

Instructions: Read the following article and summarise in not more than 100 words the importance of branding for a company.

Branding

Let us say your company has been making athletic shoes for 50 or 60 1 years. They are good shoes. Nevertheless, other companies have sped past you in the race for fame and the revenue that goes with it. Products with the logos of the other companies are status of symbols. Products with your logo make people think of basketball stars from the 1970s. To turn things around, you have to convert your product's old fashioned image into something new, and make sure consumers get the message. They must equate your product with some larger idea that has nothing to do with shoes. They need to relate your product to beauty, prosperity, or even world peace. In other words, you have to build a brand. Many powerful business labels build a strong brand due to several reasons.

The term brand comes from the practice of using a hot iron to burn a distinctive mark into the skin of a cow or a horse. For example, the owner of the Double Jay Ranch might brand a "JJ" mark on his stock. This brand helps rancher distinguish his or her animals from others. The brand is kind of label, a device for creating recognition. Branding on products is all about recognition. Branding can help companies stand out from their competitors, add value to their offer and engage with the customers.

Branding is a way of clearly highlighting what makes your offer different to, and more desirable than, anyone else's. Effective branding elevates a product or organisation from being just one commodity amongst many identical commodities, to become something with a unique character and promise. It can create an emotional resonance in the minds of consumers who choose products and services using both emotional and pragmatic judgements. Rachel's Organic Butter, for example, chose black for its packaging design so it would stand out from the typical yellow, gold and green colours (representing sunshine and fields) used by competitor products. The result is that the brand appears more premium, distinctive and perhaps even more daring than its competitors.

People are generally willing to pay more for a branded product than they are for something which is largely unbranded. A brand can be extended through a whole range of offers too. Tesco, for example, began life as an economy supermarket and now sells a wide range of products, from furniture to insurance. However, a consistent application of the Tesco brand attributes, such as ease of access and low price, has allowed the business to move into new market sectors without changing its core brand identity. This obviously adds value to the business, but consumers also see added value in the new services thanks to their existing associations with the Tesco brand. Of course, this can work in reverse too: if consumers don't like the Tesco brand in one product area, they're less likely to choose the company's offer in another product area. However, a strong, credible brand, which has gained customer's trust has the likelihood of gaining referrals and new customers.

Creating a connection with people is important for all organizations. and a brand can embody attributes which consumers will feel drawn to. In addition, part and parcel of creating differentiation is engaging with your customers or users. If you stand out of the crowd for positive reasons and your tone of voice and communications are credible, customers will look at what you've got to say. Apple's original launch of the iPod, for example, catapulted the company from computer business to mass-market entertainment brand, with iPod marketing drawing heavily on people's emotional relationship with their music. By moving into music and film. Apple redefined what the company did and shifted its brand association to something that connects with larger numbers of people outside computing or creative community. They continued this shift with introduction of the iPhone, iPad and App Store bringing portable computing and its software into mainstream consumer culture. In doing so the brand has become more and more entwined on the lives of consumers making it incredibly powerful.

Branding is both simpler and more complicated than that. It is basically the process of attaching an idea to a product. The item for sale becomes the symbol of an attractive quality or idea. Decades ago that idea might have been trustworthiness, effectiveness, or reasonable price. These show qualities that related directly to the product. Over time, the ideas have become more abstract. Branding persuades people to consume the idea by consuming the product. In its modern form, branding ties a product not to one idea, but to an entire theme, such as nonconformity or achievement. A strong brand becomes a form of identity.

Whether you're a large company or small business, crafting a branddriven marketing strategy is one of the most important things you can do 70 for your business. Creating a strong, differentiated brand is the key to turning prospects into customers.

Question II: Summary (15 marks)

Instructions: Read the following article and summarise in 100 words the negative effects of child marriages.

Child Brides -The epidemic of society

Aisha, an 18 years old Taliban girl, was married off to her husband 1 when she was only twelve. After being beaten many times and treated like a slave, she made a decision to run away from home. However, she was caught and punished. Her husband's family dragged her to a cleared mountain near the village, ignoring her cries of protest. The local Taliban commander punished her and made her an example to warn the other girls in the village not to run away from their husband's home. He gave his ruling and the men moved towards Aisha to carry out her punishment. Aisha's brother-in-law held her down and her husband pulled out a knife from his pocket. First, he sliced her ears and then her nose. At that moment, she fainted. The men had left her alone at the mountainside to die (Baker, 2010). This story shows how the child brides' rights are violated. They do not own their freedom and free to protect their rights. They cannot make their own decision to find a husband instead they are forced to marry with a person they do not even know. Child brides should be allowed to protect their own rights. Child brides often deprived of their own freedom, basic life necessities, to develop physically, mentally and socially.

Child marriages often happen in order to assist the child's family economically and socially. Most child marriages occur due to poor financial condition of the family. After marriage, child brides are no longer an economic burden to the family. Thus, it is believed that child marriage may bring wealth to the child brides' family, but not necessarily the child themselves. For example, in Yemen, almost half of the villagers live on less than two dollars a day and sometimes girls are simply married off so that the family can collect the traditional dowry while having fewer mouths 25 to feed although the child brides do not own benefits (Murdock, 2010).

Child brides may lose their freedom after they get married. They are not free to choose their husbands, to continue their studies and to find jobs. Instead, they are forced to obey their parents-in-law's decision. Moreover, they are disallowed to go outside by their husband's family and are ordered to stay in a small room. For example, Sally, a 13 years old Yemen girl, was married off to a 25 years old man. However, she realized it was a wrong decision when after marriage the family had imprisoned her in a small room. "They kept her from the outside world, and stopped her from continuing her education" (Murdock, 2010). Therefore, child brides do not have basic freedom as to protect their rights in choosing their husband. continuing their studies and even to work after they got married.

Basic quality of life is not protected in the child marriages. Health treatments, one of the basic qualities of life, are not given to child brides. They may face difficulties to access health services because of the distance, fear, expenses and agreement from their spouse. These barriers aggravate the risks of the child brides' health that cover good pregnancy care, and good medical treatment. From the statistics shown girls aged 10-14 are five times more likely to die during pregnancy or childbirth than women aged 20-24 and girls aged 15-19 have twice the risk to die from 45 pregnancy. Thus, they may face lots of health problems (Forward, 2002-2010).

Domestic violence breaches child brides' right physically or mentally. They are more likely to suffer cruel treatments such as being beaten, getting raped and abused by their spouse and his family, and even becoming a domestic slave. According to Early Marriage (Stephen, 2001), the DHS Data from Egypt, 29 per cent of married adolescents are found to receive beatings from their husband, 41 per cent during pregnancy period. Moreover, child brides may also easily encounter psychological problems from the domestic violence. They become stressed as they have to endure silently. According to Clair O'Kane, a social worker of Save Children Sweden in Pakistan, child wives are three times more probably to have psychological problems than refugees who marry after 16. (Bushell, 2002) This means violence will cause the child brides to suffer not only physically but also mentally. Therefore, child brides' are not protected physically or mentally.

In recent years child marriage has gained increasing prominence on international and national development agendas. Today, we have a unique opportunity to act on this momentum and accelerate our efforts to help change the lives of girls and young women all over the world. Ending child marriage requires work across all sectors and at all levels. It requires us to understand the complex drivers behind the practice in different contexts and adapt our interventions accordingly. Ending child marriage also requires increased, targeted investments from both international donors and governments in high prevalence countries. The funding that is currently available is nowhere near large enough to match the scale of child marriage worldwide.

SECTION B: CRITIQUE WRITING [20 MARKS]

Question I: Linear Text (10 marks)

Instructions: Read the text and answer the following question.

Social Media Causing Poor Body Image

As social media continues to play a central role in the lives of 1 adolescent girls and young women, its influence on body image and the perception of beauty continues to grow. Social media not only exposes young girls to certain beauty standards and cultural ideals of womanhood, but emerging research shows it may contribute to the development of 5 eating disorders and body dysmorphia, in females as well as males.

Social media may be a significant contributor to such behaviors. An eating disorder treatment center in Chicago revealed that 30 –50% of its teen patients used social media as a means of supporting their eating disorders. A 2011 study conducted by the University of Haifa revealed that the more time teenage girls spent on social media websites like Facebook, the greater their risk was of developing eating disorders and negative body images. Another study conducted by Florida State University in 2014 also reported a correlation between Facebook use and disordered eating behaviors.

Media images have long played a role in the development of eating disorders. Research studies conducted as far back as the 1980s and 1990s demonstrated that the decreasing weight of fashion models, actresses, and Miss America contestants between the 1950s and 1990s contributed to an increased discrepancy between the ideal female weight and the size and proportions of the average American woman at the time. During these decades, both the beauty and diet industries flooded women's magazines, advertisements, and other forms of media with glorified thinness ideals and dramatically emphasized their importance, making many women feel a sense of dissatisfaction with their bodies. Surveys conducted in the early 1990s revealed that the number-one wish of young girls ages 11 to 17 was that they could lose weight and keep it off. Similarly, when middle-aged women were asked what they would most like to change about their lives,

Despite growing knowledge and awareness of this phenomenon, the role of media in body dissatisfaction, body dysmorphia, and eating disorders has not changed over the years. On the contrary, social media may have a more negative impact than other forms of media as it plays a larger role in the daily lives of youth. Young girls not only have to deal with the objectification of famous women's bodies in the media, but their own bodies, as well as those of their peers, are often subject to objectification through the posting of what has come to be known as "selfies".

more than 50% responded with "their weight" as the answer.

Not only has the nature of media consumption changed, but the audience has as well. Where youth were once just exposed to their 40 surrounding peers, they can now readily access the opinions, behaviors, and ideals of thousands of people instantly. There are many online pages, groups, and hashtags that promote disordered eating. As part of the so-called pro-anorexia or pro-bulimia movement, these websites support those with eating disorders and encourage people to post photos of what they call progress. The thinspiration, thinspo, and thinspogram hashtags are used often by pro-ana and pro-mia communities to post photos of thin celebrities idolized as an inspiration for such eating disorders. These groups provide tips on becoming thin, hiding eating disorder behaviors, suppressing hunger, and keeping stomach acid from harming the teeth. In past years, many "thinspiration" websites were taken down as a means of prevention, but social media has made this information increasingly difficult to monitor and control.

Social media can be incredibly dangerous for young people with low self-esteem and distorted body image, since they often find a sense of community and acceptance among pro-ana and pro-mia online groups that support and encourage their disordered eating. Where others may be expressing concern about their behaviors and weight loss, online pro-ana and pro-mia communities offer support and validation. The likes, thumbs-ups, and comments on their photos can provide reinforcement to continue losing weight despite health problems or concerns. Some users will even use their likes as inspiration for their behavior.
